discussion was quite animated, though, of course, conducted in friendly spirit.

Some time ago, upon complaint of the Citizens' Protective Association and others, the Common Council passed an ordinance restraining the railroad company from running its cars through the city at a greater speed than three miles an hour: from blockading the streets by its trains, and from using Washington street for shipping purposes at certain hours. Under this ordinance numerous complaints were made against the railroad company for violations, and fines were imposed to such an extent as to become burdensome and cause a protest. and cause a protest A PROTEST.

A PROTEST.

The shippers of the community also protested that since the passage of their restrictive ordinance the railroad company had been guilty of great delay in the shipments of freights, which was not only a matter of much inconvenience but operated against Petersburg and its merchants in the great competition for trade. The railroad company complained of the injustice of the cardinance, and declared that it could not obey the restrictions placed upon it without detriment to its business; and intimations were given out that if these frequent fines were imposed the company might find it necessary to change its route and run around the city. On the other hard, the people living alors and in the vicanty of Washington, street, on which the road runs, comp a'n bitterly of the constabl annoyance caused them both by day and night. It was to reconcile all these differences that the conference meeting was held.
